

The Sense of an Audience: Spectators and Spectatorship in Early Modern England

by

Amy J. Rodgers

A dissertation submitted in partial fulfillment of the requirements for the degree of Doctor of Philosophy
(English Language and Literature)
in The University of Michigan
2009

Doctoral Committee:

Professor Valerie J. Traub, Chair
Professor Richard Abel
Professor Barbara C. Hodgdon
Professor Michael C. Schoenfeldt
Associate Professor Theresa L. Tinkle

© Amy Rodgers
2009

Dedicated to the memory of my father

Acknowledgements

Like any endeavor that takes shape over multiple years and locations, this dissertation has been shaped by myriad influences, both direct and indirect. Those that are most immediately legible come from my extraordinary dissertation committee, whose belief in both me and this project never faltered. Individually, they have all played unique roles in my development as a thinker and teacher. Without Mike Schoenfeldt, I would not have ended up at the University of Michigan; his keen eye for detail and finely-tuned historical sensibilities have made and continue to make this project a more rigorous and better one. Theresa Tinkle's warmth and passion for her work (both scholarly and pedagogical) helped me understand why I was in graduate school. Barbara Hodgdon and Richard Abel have been exacting yet generous mentors, gracious hosts, superb friends and, most importantly, part of my family. Finally, my chair, Valerie Traub, has been generous with both her time and spirit, and somehow managed to walk the fine line between intellectual guidance and free rein. She has set for me (and many others) a mentoring standard that I do not expect to meet, but for which I will continue to reach.

I cannot imagine having completed the dissertation without the generous financial support of the University of Michigan's Department of English Language and Literature, the Horace H. Rackham School of Graduate Studies and the Institute for the Humanities. Additional funding and support was provided by the Making Publics (MaPs) project at McGill University – a summer's workshop in 2008, led by Paul Yachnin and Steven Mullaney, helped me focus what, exactly, the dissertation was trying to say.

Much of what the project has become was sparked by an earlier time and place. During my undergraduate years at Columbia University, I was influenced by many generous and passionate scholars, in particular Peter Awn, Andrea Solomon, Jennifer Kassinoff, Anne Prescott, Susan Thames and Chloe Wheatley. Austin Flint's encouragement and sensitivity to life itself helped me challenge myself as a writer and human being. Jean Howard, who ignited my fascination with early modern England, continues to be a force of nature in my thinking and teaching.

One's scholarship is not, I hope, simply the sum of their education. To this end, I must thank those who have played other roles in my life, many of them dual ones. My dissertation writing group was composed of good drinkers and better friends; I owe a special debt to Kentston Bauman, LaMont Egle, Gavin Hollis, David Lavinsky, and Chad Thomas. Caroline Giordano accompanied me on the long drive to Ann Arbor from my home in New York City; she has been there ever since. Thank you also to my colleagues at the Institute for the Humanities, especially Danna Agmon, Eva-Marie Dubuisson, Monica Kim and Lembit Beecher, who made the final tumultuous year of graduate school not only bearable but enjoyable. Many staff and faculty at the University of Michigan helped me negotiate the various frustrations and hoops that are an inevitable by-product of graduate school, especially Jan Burgess, Bonnie Campbell, Lori Scott, Sue Kirby, Mary Lou Chlipala, Phil Hallman, Donna Johnston, Eliza Woodford, Giorgio Bertellini, Anne Curzan, Danny Herwitz, Adela Pinch, Lucia Saks and Gaylyn Studlar. My friends from New York who have listened patiently to my fears and frustrations over the past eight years deserve special thanks for standing by me even at my worst moments. To Larry, Fernando, Cheryl, Leon, Roxana, Miro, Phil, Marie and Leigh, I love you.

Finally, thanks are due to the people at the center of my life, who keep me sane and happy. My mother, Agnes Rodgers, no matter what I have done, has provided the love and encouragement I needed to follow my instincts. Kentston Bauman was a staunch ally and selfless friend before he became my partner in all things. My sons, Owen and Calvin, remind me daily that one's life and one's self is far more than the sum of one's work. And, to my father, who helped me understand that the best life is one that takes in all things with voraciousness and courage, I dedicate this dissertation.

Table of Contents

Dedication	ii
Acknowledgements	iii
Chapter
Introduction.....	1
One. Towards a Theory of Spectatorship: 1577-1603	24
Two. The Shattering of the Spectator: Misprision, Alienation and Identification in The Knight of the Burning Pestle	70
Three. A Modeled Audience: Fashioning the Spectator in Shakespeare's Romances	109
Four. The Language of Looking: Making Sense in Jonsonian Masque	166
Conclusion: The Oracle Effect.....	210
Works Cited	217